COLLECTION SUMMARY

This collection includes over 500 pieces of correspondence relating to Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederate States of America, and Confederate generals, including G.T. Beauregard, Braxton Bragg, Samuel Cooper, Joseph E. Johnson, Robert E. Lee, James A. Seddon, E. Kirby Smith, Richard Taylor, and William H. Thomas, among other noted figures of the Civil War and the mid- to late-19th century. Correspondence of Varina Davis, Mary Randolph Custis Lee, and Mary Custis Lee, together with some photographs and other pieces of ephemera, can also be found in the collection.

PROVENANCE OF THE COLLECTION

This collection was begun by Sutton C. Richey (1837-1900). After studying Miami University in 1854 and 1855, Richey worked as a druggist in Oxford, Ohio from 1857 to 1891. Richey also served as treasurer of Miami University (1869-1900) and the Village of Oxford (1874-1900).

Admiration for Robert E. Lee as a leader, educator and gentleman inspired Sutton Richey's son, Samuel W. Richey (1874-1973), to become interested in Jefferson Davis and collect documents relating to his career. An 1894 graduate of Miami University, Samuel Richey worked as a Cincinnati lumber broker.

The majority of this collection was donated to Miami University in 1960; other items were acquired more recently as a result of an endowment that provides funds to purchase important items complementing the contents of the original collection.

SCOPE AND CONTENTS OF THE COLLECTION

This collection includes documents that were written by staff officers, clerks, and Confederate officers, as well as civilians, both during and after the Civil War. Of the more than 500 documents comprising the collection, 218 items relate directly to Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederate States of America.

One of the earliest documents in the collection is Davis' commission as First Lieutenant in the Regiment of Dragoons of the U.S. Army following his graduation from West Point. Dated May 10, 1834, the document bears the signatures of President Andrew Jackson and Secretary of War Lewis Cass.

Davis' April 23, 1861 letter to Claiborne Fox Jackson urges the importance of having the star of Missouri in the Confederate flag, while his March 13, 1862 letter to William M. Brooks discusses the criticism of the Confederate President in the North and the South. On January 27, 1863, Davis wrote to Governor Brown of Georgia approving the bill before the Georgia Legislature to prohibit the growing of cotton in Georgia for the duration of the war. A February 29, 1864 letter from John C. Robinson to Davis on behalf of the Indians loyal to the Confederacy provides an outline of future policies concerning them.

In an August 6, 1864 letter to Davis, Lucy E. White of Woodville, Mississippi writes on behalf of her brother, Col. M.C. White, seeking to take him to Europe for the surgical care he requires. Recognizing that her brother's ill health will prevent his rendering further service to his country and that her plan is fraught with difficulties, Miss White seeks to procure her brother's pay for his support in Europe. She closes, "This request would have been made by a male member of the family but all who can bear arms are now in the fields."

"Prompted by a solemn conviction of duty," Ben Lane Posey ventured "in disregard of military etiquette" to write to Davis "some important truths involving the fortune of this army" and the fate of the Confederacy. In this September 20, 1864 letter, Posey tells Davis that the army is in very bad condition – not only deficient in food, clothes, and military supplies, but also possessing a low morale, prompted by one victory at Chickamauga and nearly three years of defeats, disasters and retreats. Posey suggests that when Davis seeks the truth, he should not rely upon Lieutenant Generals and Major Generals for information because they are too far removed from the rank and file of the army to know the opinions and feelings of the soldiers. Instead, he should call upon the regimental and company officers, and even the soldiers in the ranks.

On December 30, 1864, Francis Preston Blair wrote Davis, asking permission to visit Richmond. The results of this conference are contained in a seven-page manuscript providing a summary of their confidential conversation. Davis' January 12, 1865 memorandum provides details of a conversation he had with Blair concerning his meeting with Abraham Lincoln. The memorandum recounts Lincoln's inability to control the extreme party that had control in Congress, his desire to stop the "further effusion of blood" and, as a fellow Southerner, hoped that "the pride, power and honor of the Southern states should suffer no shock." He also stated his belief that slavery was doomed to extinction. The conference was designed to result in a "negotiation for a peaceful solution of the questions at issue" with Davis.

In a March 24, 1865 letter to Davis, Robert E. Lee requests that Davis call upon the Governor of Virginia for the "whole number of negroes, slave and free between the ages of eighteen and forty five, for Service as soldiers...[as] the services of these men are now necessary to enable us to oppose the enemy." The collection also includes an April 2, 1865 memo from Davis to Lee a week before his surrender at Appomattox and a note from Lee to General Ulysses S. Grant a few days later concerning prisoner exchange.

The collection includes a handwritten copy of Davis' address to the people of the Confederate States of America, as printed in the Danville Register on April 4, 1865. In the address, Davis informs his citizens that the government has been withdrawn from Richmond and the moral and material injuries that result in the enemy's occupation of Richmond. Despite this turn of events, Davis assures Southerners that he will maintain their cause and asks them to "meet the foe with fresh defiance, with unconquered and unconquerable hearts."

On April 23, 1865, Secretary of War John C. Breckenridge advised Davis that "we can no longer continue with a reasonable hope of success. It seems to me that the time has arrived when, in a large and clear view of the situation, prompt steps should be taken to put an end to the war. The terms proposed are not wholly unsuited to the altered condition of affairs. The states are preserved, certain essential rights are secured and the Army rescued from degradation."

When the war ended, Davis was imprisoned at Fort Monroe in Phoebus, Virginia for two years. He was eventually released on bail, and never tried, but he temporarily lost his home in Mississippi, most of his wealth, and his U.S. citizenship (which was posthumously restored in the 20th century). After his release from Fortress Monroe, John Mitchel sent a letter on November 1, 1865 to Varina Davis that provides an account of the condition of her husband and two other prisoners there. He tells her that he has a very strong impression that Davis will not be long in confinement, and that he will not even be tried. Although "a magnanimous public requires his suffering & humiliation" at present, he assures her that "you will find him not much worse in body, and not one whit bowed down in spirit."

The collection includes a May 25, 1866 pledge by Davis that he will not escape Fort Monroe for the privilege of being allowed on the grounds inside the fort's walls during the day. Following that item in the collection is a May 14, 1867 letter from Franklin Pierce to Varina Davis informing her of the government's declining to proceed with Davis' trial and releasing him on bail. The letter also includes an invitation to Mrs. Davis and her family to stay at his cottage at Little Boars Head, testifying to the friendship established between the Pierces and the Davises during their years in Washington, D.C.

An attention-getting letter written to Davis by Horace E. Hayden on September 15, 1879 requests permission to publish information about the use of explosive and poisoned balls and charges made that the Confederates used poison gas during the war.

In a letter written from his home at Belvoir, Mississippi, to his friend, Col. W.J. Green, on April 25, 1889, Davis describes himself as "time worn and heart sore." Davis died on December 6, 1889.

An undated, unaddressed piece of correspondence states Davis' recollections of Hiram Powers' design for a statue for the dome of the Capitol in Washington, D.C. when Davis was a member of a Senate committee appointed to adopt a plan for the extension and improvement of the Capitol. As Secretary of War, Davis was directed that the War Department would supervise and direct the execution of the work. Powers was one of several distinguished American "statuaries" who submitted designs. According to Davis, Powers' original design was to represent a female figure with a "liberty cap" on her head. Davis writes, "I objected to the "liberty cap" as the accepted emblem of the freed [Roman] slave, at the same time stating that our people were born free and had maintained their freedom. Mr. Powers modified his design, substituting for the cap a crown of feathers, as appropriate to our Aborigines by which he thought to render as the representative of which the statue was to stand typical of America." The design was accepted and Powers executed the work.

Letters written by contemporaries of Davis provide eyewitness accounts of the events they describe. G.T. Beauregard, the first prominent general for the Confederate States Army during the Civil War, commanded the defenses of Charleston, South Carolina at Fort Sumter and won the First Battle of Bull Run near Manassas, Virginia. He also commanded armies in the Battle of Shiloh in Tennessee, but his greatest achievement was saving the Virginia cities of Petersburg and Richmond from Union armies in 1864. Letters in the collection hint at Beauregard's poor professional relationship with Jefferson Davis and other senior Confederate officials. Letters by Beauregard are also concerned with various phases of military affairs and campaigns. Of particular interest are the copies of orders appointing General Beauregard Commandant of the United States Military Academy at West Point in November 1860 and the January 25, 1861 order returning him to Louisiana. The collection also includes a manuscript copy of Beauregard's address to his army immediately before the battle of Shiloh dated May 2, 1862.

Other items pertaining to G.T. Beauregard include a report of orders conveyed by Alexander Robert Chisholm during the Battle of Shiloh; Beauregard's speech to troops before the Battle of Corinth, and dictation regarding events at Fort Sumter and Beauregard's departure for Manassas, Virginia. Other documents outline Beauregard's order during the siege of Charleston to hold Fort Sumter, the defense of Petersburg in June 1864 and a mine explosion of July 30, 1864. Extracts from his war reminiscences provide additional details of his service during the Civil War.

The next group of correspondence in the collection pertains to Braxton Bragg, a Confederate States Army general who was a principal commander in the Western Theater of the Civil War. An August 5, 1862 letter from Davis offers suggestions for how Bragg might deal with the press and officers in his command. Other highlights include a letter to Leonidas Polk written on January 11, 1863, regarding the press's thoughts about Bragg and its effect upon soldier morale. In a letter dated April 4, 1864, Bragg urges that Generals Ransom and Pickett lead troops on a special mission to Tarboro, North Carolina. On July 16, 1864, Bragg sent Jefferson Davis a report of conditions around Atlanta, urging that John B. Hood be placed in command there. Other letters deal with exemptions from the draft and the inefficiency of secret service men.

Other correspondence of Confederate generals includes a May 4, 1863 letter from General John C. Pemberton to Samuel Cooper, describing conditions at Vicksburg, including the capture of prisoners and the burning of ships on the river. Letters written by General Joseph Eggleston Johnston demonstrate his understanding of the Confederacy's military difficulties. This correspondence also includes a manuscript copy of the terms of surrender drawn up between General William Tecumseh Sherman and Johnston near Durham, North Carolina on April 26, 1865.

Letters written by General E. Kirby Smith outline military operations in Louisiana and the Trans-Mississippi West, while the correspondence of Richard Taylor is concerned with the military defenses of Louisiana and Mobile, Alabama. Letters written by William H. Thomas contain information about military stores and supplies collected in Louisiana, Georgia and Alabama.

Correspondence by Jefferson Davis' wife, Varina, also appears in this collection. In a March 25, 1865 letter, she requests to exchange yardage of brown flannel for plaid flannel. Two pieces of black-bordered stationery used by Mrs. Davis for correspondence with William E. Mickle in March and September of 1890 suggest the recent death of her husband.

Several letters by Mary Randolph Custis Lee, wife of Robert E. Lee, provide an interesting highlight of this collection. Writing a letter on August 30, 1870 to Moses Ezekiel, a Virginia Military Institute cadet and Civil War veteran who would later become a noted sculptor of his day, Mrs. Lee reveals details of sculptor Edward Valentine creating a bust of her husband. She also describes activities in Lexington, Virginia, including the completion of the Lee's home and the church adjacent to it, and activities at Washington College and Virginia Military Institute.

Letters from the Lees' daughter, Mary Custis Lee (1835-1918), can also be found in the collection. For example, an April 22, 1913 letter to Moses Ezekiel expresses thanks for his letter of sympathy on the death of her brother, George Washington Custis Lee, who died on February 18, 1913. In the letter, she describes her return to Virginia as a result of her brother's failing health, his burial in Lexington, Virginia, her stay in Savannah, Georgia, and her thoughts about Ezekiel's Confederate Soldiers' Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery, which he completed in 1914.

The Ezekiel family makes another appearance in the collection when Henry Clay Ezekiel, brother of Moses Ezekiel, writes Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, on September 18, 1867. In this letter, Ezekiel requests a list of all of the names that were signed to the bail bond for Jefferson Davis. On September 22, 1867, Greeley responds, directing Ezekiel to a May 25, 1867 copy of the Tribune, in which the names were printed. He notes that his name – together with that of Cornelius Vanderbilt – were the only ones in which he took any interest; the rest were those of Democrats or Southerners.

The collection also includes dozens of letters that detail occurrences during the Civil War and the years of Reconstruction. For example, Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson's written permission of May 3, 1861 that granted Private S.J. Campbell a 14-day leave of absence can be found here. Another letter dated April 18, 1861 provides an account of a meeting of Virginia citizens where an effigy of Abraham Lincoln was present and a band played "Old Virginny Shore." Other letters offer information about troop movements and morale; the drunken condition of General Crittenden when he was in Knoxville, Tennessee; directions appointing a commission to examine the affairs of the Bank of Louisiana and subsequent operations of the bank; shipments of cotton and railroad iron; treatment of blacks; and recognition of individuals' service to the Confederacy. An April 14, 1864 account from Wilkesboro, North Carolina informs Zebulon Baird Vance of drunken troops stealing bacon and other supplies and assaulting the family to whom the supplies belonged.

One letter in the collection attests to the popularity of obtaining autographs and other items associated with those who held leadership positions during the Civil War – a practice which is illustrated in the very existence of this collection. For example, on June 3, 1866, John Letcher wrote his brother, Henry, that he had successfully obtained Stonewall Jackson's autograph for him. Letcher had obtained the autograph from Mr. S.O. Campbell after telling him of his brother's coin and autograph collection. "I told him it deserved to be pasted up and framed and that I would have it done, he was loth to part with it but as he had a letter of the Genl's, his wife told him to give me this which he did," Letcher wrote. He wrote that he was also enclosing some of Mary Randolph Custis Lee's writing.

An April 5, 1890 letter from John M. Sandidge describes a knife and a crucifix given to him by Clement C. Clay, Davis' fellow prisoner at Fortress Monroe, together with details of his first meeting with Davis after his release from imprisonment.

Additional details of the work of sculptor Moses Ezekiel are provided by four letters by Mary Anna Jackson, wife of Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson, to Henry Clay Ezekiel, the sculptor's brother. Written between October and December 1908, these letters document Mrs. Jackson's assistance in helping Ezekiel study several of Stonewall Jackson's personal items on loan to the Confederate Museum in Richmond, Virginia for creating a statue of Jackson to be erected in Charleston, West Virginia.

The collection includes a number of miscellaneous documents associated with the Southern Confederacy, including a handwritten copy of the act ceding Fort Sumter to the United States from South Carolina; military commissions; general orders; field returns of the Army of the Potomac; newspaper articles from the 1880s, and fragments of manuscripts about the Civil War. A January 2, 1865 letter from an unknown correspondent to Abraham Lincoln outlines a request to go to Washington, D.C. to arrange the bases for negotiation to end the Civil War.

Photographs of John Brown, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston and Robert E. Lee can be found in the collection, together with prints of Jefferson Davis. Song lyrics titled "Jeff in Petticoats" are an example of ephemera housed in the collection.

Since an endowment provides funds to purchase important letters that complement the contents of the original collection, recent acquisitions include 17 pieces of Jefferson Davis' correspondence that offer some unique insights into Davis' daily life. Highlights from this portion of the collection include two letters that Davis wrote to Edward Everett, the owner of the Washington, D.C. house he rented while serving as Secretary of War in 1855. These letters outline work needing to be done on the house and the need to modify its heating system. Later letters in this section of the collection provide details of the Davis family's activities circa January 30, 1889 and Davis' acceptance of an invitation to address the Industrial Association of Winnebago County at their September 1875 meeting.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COLLECTION

When work first began on processing this collection prior to 2008, the collection was designed to be presented in bound volumes. As a result, several documents were encapsulated, given a numerical order, and bound. Therefore, the first series of the collection presents the encapsulated, bound documents in the order assigned by the previous processors. Where available, the number assigned to each item has been indicated in the inventory, underneath the page number of the items in each bound volume. The subseries of this portion of the collection indicates the person to whom the majority of the correspondence in those bound volumes pertains.

The second series of the collection presents the unbound, unencapsulated documents that comprise the rest of the collection. Each subseries of the collection indicates the person to which that particular group of correspondence pertains. A small series of photographs and ephemera follows this section of the collection.

An endowment provides funds to purchase important letters that complement the contents of the original collection. These recently added items are organized under "Recent Acquisitions."

Transcripts of documents in bound volumes are provided at the end of the collection.
 Transcripts of unbound documents are housed with each corresponding item in its folder.
